In the years around 1910, the air in Josephine, Texas smelled of sulphur as the Cotton Belt Railroad made “Gumbo Gravel.”

Long trenches were dug with steam shovel. A layer of crossties were placed in the trenches. Then a layer of coal and a layer of dirt were placed on the crossties. The area was watered to keep the coals from burning too fast. This process was used in making the reddish gravel known as “Ballast Gumbo Gravel.”

Mr. and Mrs. Harvey were in charge of burning the coals. Engine Number 4, also known as a Dinky, was used in transporting the gravel to the main railroad line.

The Cotton Belt Railroad used the “Gumbo Gravel” in making the railroad track from Fort Worth to Texarkana, Texas. The “Gumbo Gravel” was used to hold the crossties in place and keep them from washing away.

Three pits were created on the Jordan land about two miles north of the Josephine business section. Later, two more pits were dug on the Hubbard land south of the original pits. As a result, small lakes were formed.

The “Gumbo Pits” has a major role in creating the railroad connecting Collin County with nearby counties. The railroad allowed settlers of Collin County to travel to places much faster and safer. It truly made a difference in the lives of early settlers of Collin County, Texas.
This historic Onion Shed, restored in 2002, was one of several onion sheds in Farmersville, built by the railroads for the packing and shipping of the Collin County Sweets. In 1925 local farmers began planting onion crops and by 1935 Farmersville was known as the “Onion Capitol of North Texas.” Migrant workers came each January to plant the onion slips. In late May or June, the crews returned to harvest the onion. Many of Farmersville’s young men worked on the shed, grading and sacking the onions to make them ready to ship by rail to places all across the country. The smell of onions permeated the town. The Collin County Sweets were mild onions, popular for their sweet flavor. For several years, during the height of the season, an onion festival was held, complete with a parade, marching bands, and an onion queen, Queen Noino (onion spelled backwards). The onion industry declined as growers in south and west Texas and other areas developed onion varieties suitable for their soil and climate conditions. These onions were not as perishable as Collin County Sweets and were easier to ship.
Bill Smith’s Café is the oldest continuously owned family restaurant in Collin County. Opened in August of 1956 by Bill and Jeanette Smith, many thought Bill Smith’s Café would not survive because it was built out in the country in the middle of a cotton patch. However, with its $1.45 T-Bones and 85 cent lunch specials, it became a popular place to gather despite its rural location.

Bill Smith’s Café was originally designed as a one-room café featuring a grill, the center of all activity, in full view of the customers. For employees, the Smiths enlisted their children before accepting applications. Today, Bill Smith, Jr. runs the restaurant.

With its 1950’s neon sign, Bill Smith’s Café has become a Collin County landmark which has served generations of regular customers.
According to the late Collin County Historian, Capt. Roy F. Hall, the two-room log cabin that once belonged to Republic of Texas colonist Thomas Jefferson McDonald is contained (in whole or in part) in the cottage behind this marker underneath two layers of siding, McDonald immigrated with his wife, H.Y., from Missouri in early 1844 to become a part of the Peters Colony. Thus this cabin predates the creation of Collin County, McKinney, and the state of Texas.

In latter 1844, Indians (either Kiowas or Commanches) raided the log cabin while the McDonalds were visiting friends about six miles away on Honey Creek. Entering the cabin and wrecking the contents, the pillagers ripped open several feather mattresses and pillows, scattering feathers far and wide. They killed McDonald's pigs and chickens but left the cabin’s structure intact. This incident was one of the last Indian raids in what would be later named Collin County.

In 1916, James M. Pitts purchased a tract of the T.J. McDonald survey. In 1933, James Pitts’ son, Ben Pitts, and his wife, Orene Craft Pitts, moved into the old log cabin which had been remodeled by that time. Ben later purchased this site, which adjoined his other land holdings. Over their marriage, Ben and Olene added modern conveniences and extra rooms to form a comfortable six-room cottage in which to raise their only child, Carolyn. Ben and Orene Pitts lived here all their married life until their respective deaths—Ben in 1967 and Orene in 1996.
The migrant workers camp was converted to a POW camp late in WWII—February 1945. The Princeton camp housed POWs for less than a year. The farmers would come to the camp in trucks and take the prisoners to their fields just as they had the migrant workers. Under the Geneva Convention, the farmers were to pay the prisoners two dollars a day for their work. The farmers did not have enough labor or farm since all the boys were away at war. Not only did the prisoners work in the fields, but they also did a stonemasonry work in downtown Princeton. Others helped construct a park in Princeton built in memory of the men who served in the armed forces during WWII and a shrine to perpetuate the memory of those who lost their lives in the war. The war was over in August of 1945, but the prisoners were not released until the following January.
Once inhabited by the Caddo Indians, the thriving Squeezepenny community was situated on a long hill running at least 1.5 miles in all four directions from this marker. No one knows exactly where the community got its name. Some sources claim the local storekeeper was extremely careful with his money. Others say a mill owner always demanded his exact share of the ground meal.

According to Capt. Roy F. Hall, Collin County historian, the William Hampton family established a grist mill in 1855 thus giving Squeezepenny its start. Thomas Alexander Craft, Sr., and his wife Julia, purchased the mill from Hampton and continued its operation until the Civil War. At that time, the mill, pictured above was used to card wool and cotton, which were spun into threads and woven into cloth for Civil War uniforms. Craft also operated a cotton Gin in Squeezepenny had a blacksmith shop and a general store operated by Joseph and Mary Bassham.

Rock for construction of the historic Collin County courthouse and the old county jail located in McKinney, both built in 1874, was quarried from a location on the Craft farm immediately west of this site. Upon completion, the courthouse was the tallest building north of San Antonio. In 1927, the courthouse was remodeled, and the beautiful stone was covered. The original stone remains exposed on the historic old jail.
This church was deeded on Sept. 5, 1894 by A. E. and Bettie Wilson as a site for the Methodist Episcopal Church South. The first trustees were H. C. Rutledge, H. C. Bridgefarmer and A. L. Reneau. It still retains the original bell in the bell tower.

The last living deacon and one of the first groundskeepers was Samuel H. Smith (1883-1975). Bertha M. Thomas (1913-2006) was the last living member.

In the early 1900’s the chapel was serviced by deacons who rode a circuit including Princeton & Bethel. Circuit riding ministers were Rev. W. R. Gouldlock, Rev. J. D. Cunningham, J. E. Short, L. A. Hanson, Rev. H. H. Bain, J. A. Bell, C. F. McKinney, J. R. Jordan, and M. L. Dickey. Claus H. Rohlf was the church’s last preacher. He served in the early 1950’s.

Some of the prominent family names in the early church were Lowry, Bridgefarmer, Rutledge, Reneau, Scalf, Smith, and Myrick. The chapel and the adjacent cemetery are all that remains of the early Wilson Community.
On February 4, 1841, the Republic of Texas passed an act authorizing a contract with William S. Peters and Associates to establish a colony in North Texas. One of their offices was located on this site. The next 10 years saw much legislative action and additionally much confusion concerning land titles. The colonists were upset with the high-handed treatment on the part of the Peters and Associates’ agent, British born Oliver Hedgecoxe. In 1852 a group from Dallas forced its way into Hedgecoxe’s office, examined the records and reported evidence of “fraud”. Several days later a group of 75 people, made up of local officials and a number of “adventurers” made their way toward the office. Having been forewarned, Hedgecoxe hid out in a nearby cornfield, with some of his records. He eventually made his way to Bonham, and then to Louisville, KY. The “mob” took other records to Dallas where they were destroyed when the courthouse burned. The records that Hedgecoxe took were never seen again.

Thus ended the saga of the Hedgecoxe War with “nary” a shot being fired. Hedgecoxe continued with the company and supervised the surveying of its western land and the issuing of titles. Many of his descendants still live in Collin County.

A History of Collin County, Texas by Stambaugh and Stambaugh
In 1930 a giant fossil fish was discovered near here on Haw Branch by Homer Lafayette Merritt of Celina, Texas. With the help of a trained technician, this fish was carefully excavated and is now on display in the basement of the Texas Memorial Museum, University of Texas, Austin, Texas.

This giant fossil fish from the Cretaceous Period of Texas, measures 12 feet, 10 inches in length. 65,000,000 years ago, when this fish was living, large areas of Texas were covered by warm seas containing a great many kinds of strange plants, fish, clams, and reptiles. Initially covered by soft, limy deposits at the bottom of the sea, through time agents of erosion exposed many of these fossils. This particular fish is a relative of present day tarpon, salmon, herring, and trout.*

This iron truss bridge was one of the last two one-lane, iron truss bridges in Collin County still being used for vehicular traffic until 2008 when it was moved to this site. Since at least the 1920s, it had allowed farmers and other Collin County travelers to cross Sister Grove Creek at CR 475 near Valdasta.

Iron truss bridges like this one were completely assembled at the factory and then partially disassembled for shipping. The structural channels, “I” beans and gusset plates at the truss member intersections were pre-cut, pre-drilled and riveted into components at the factory. The square headed nuts and bolts were assembled on-site using local labor.

The wood beams and decking came from local saw mills and were also installed on-site. The “I” beam was later added to the approach and top sections of this bridge to stiffen and strengthen it.

First erected in Collin County in the 1880s, iron truss bridges were a big improvement over wooden bridges. This bridge was replaced by a two-lane, concrete bridge which accommodates larger farm equipment and other modern day vehicles. (2011)
This iron truss bridge has been transporting farmers and the people of Collin County across Sister Grove Creek on CR 475 since at least the 1920s. It was among the last of the single-lane, iron truss bridges in the county used for vehicular travel. Iron truss bridges were first erected in Collin County in the 1880s.

Iron truss bridges like this one were completely assembled at the factory and then partially disassembled for shipping. They were re-assembled on site.

The square headed nuts and bolts were assembled on-site using local labor. The wood beams and decking came from local sawmills and were also installed on-site. An “I” beam was later added to the approach and top sections of this bridge to stiffen and strengthen it. The weight limits of this bridge were 16,000 pounds gross or 10,000 pounds per axle.

Iron truss bridges were a big improvement over wooden bridges. They vastly improved the flow of transportation in the county. (2011)
This one-lane, iron truss bridge, which spanned Sister Grove Creek on CR 476 near Westminster, was one of the last bridges of its kind in Collin County used for vehicular traffic. It was built in 1929.

Originally wooden bridges spanned the creeks in Collin County transporting pedestrians, horses and wagons and early farm equipment. The remains of the original wooden bridge at this site is on the bank under the iron bridge. The wooden bridges required constant repair and replacement after floods.

With the mechanization of farming in the county at the beginning of the 20th century and the use of heavier tractors and farm implements, the wooden bridges were replaced with stronger iron bridges. The weight limits on this bridge were 12,000 pounds gross or 7500 pounds per axle.

Iron truss bridges were erected in Collin County as early as the 1880s. They served the county for over 100 years into the 21st century. (2010)
Iron Bridge CR476 Site - Westminster

This marks the site of one of the last two iron truss bridges in Collin County still being used for vehicular traffic until 2008. It was moved to span the creek between the Collin County Courthouse and the Jack Hatchell Administration Building on Bloomdale Road in McKinney. This bridge is currently a foot bridge for pedestrians between these two public buildings.

Originally wooden bridges spanned the creeks in Collin County transporting horses and wagons and early farm equipment. The wooden bridges required constant repair and even replacement after floods. With the mechanization of farming in the county at the beginning of the 20th century and the use of heavy steam and petroleum traction engines and tractors, stronger bridges were needed.

Iron truss bridges were assembled at the factory and then partially disassembled for shipping. They were re-assembled on site using local labor. The wooden decking and other parts of the bridge were made locally.

Iron truss bridges were first erected in Collin County in the 1880s. The iron truss bridge is known to have been in use here over Sister Grove Creek at CR 476 long before World War II. It was replaced by this two-lane concrete bridge in 2008. (2011)
The goal of the county marker committee is to preserve the history of Collin County by recognizing county historical sites and awarding county historical markers to those sites that might not qualify for state historic recognition but are important to the history of the county. Only five will be selected this year.
